"With millions of Americans in this country still unable to easily understand, understand, and engage with the nuances of a topic so complex, the scientific community is working with us to begin studying these complex topics, including climate communication," said EPA regional administrator Peter O'Neill, adding that people could submit their proposal for proposed changes through either the agency's online comment portal or by submitting letters via mail or in person. "For example, if you disagree with the notion that coal-fired power plants are causing climate change, we would be happy to make sure you know what science says about the effects of carbon emissions on human and ecosystem health—and, of course, you can take it to the EPA." O'Neill said that anyone who submitted a letter could be referred for an opportunity to speak at a scientific symposium about climate science, which he said was already scheduled..
